

Report of Two Days Online Workshop on Usage of Databases and Research Metrics (7-8 April, 2022)

A Two Days Online workshop on Usage of Databases and Research Metrics was organized by The Centre for Research, Innovation and Training (CRIT), IIS (Deemed to be University), Jaipur on 7-8 April, 2021. The workshop was attended by 145 participants from all over the country. Prof. K. S. Sharma, Director, CRIT and Advisor, IIS (Deemed to be University), Jaipur delivered the welcome address. and apprised the participants about CRIT and the workshop. Dr. Amita Sharma, Department of Computer Science and Information Technology, elaborated upon the objectives of the two days workshop. The workshop was moderated by Dr. Charu Jhamaria, Department of Environmental Science. The Resource Person for the workshop was Dr. Madhulika Bhati, Principal Scientist and Deputy Head, AcSIR. The main objective of workshop was to encourage students and faculty members in improving research practices through the use of research metrics. The workshop aimed to acquaint the students with various research databases and the usage of metrics to monitor the research.

The Speaker, Dr. Madhulika Bhati, stated the significance of Review of Literature as the research gap can only be found after comprehensive review of literature. She also stressed that research should not only be limited to laboratories, but should also have practical applicability. She explained that using various databases provides comprehensive citation data for many academic disciplines. She insisted on using more than one database for research. She gave a detailed demonstration on how to search for the topic on Web of Science and Scopus. She explained about research data life cycle and application of data analytic tools to integrate knowledge mapping. She also explained about calculation of h-index by the researcher.

The session ended with the question and answer round. Dr. Charu Jhamaria, Department of Environmental Science delivered the vote of thanks. The workshop proved to be very engaging and helped the participants in developing in depth knowledge about selecting various databases and tools for research.

Finding journal articles - when to use a search engine and when to use a database

Most research databases index journal literature, including academic and practitioner articles. You can also use search engines like Library Search or Google Scholar (Scholar does not index practitioner articles).

When should you use a database instead of a search engine and what is the difference between them?

- Open web search engines are useful for grey literature but not for academic literature. Library Search and Google Scholar are useful for quick searches or initial searches.
- For focused searching when you have a search strategy and a set of keywords, databases are more efficient.
- Databases are either multidisciplinary or subject-specific, focusing on outputs common to that subject area (empirical education research, review articles, survey reports or evaluation of education policy documents for example).
- Multidisciplinary databases are high-quality, curated databases with value-added features allowing you to search across thousands of journal articles, using features to help you focus your search and to find related literature. They often also include traditional and alternative metrics. SCOPUS and Web of Science are the two main multidisciplinary databases.
- Subject-specific databases are smaller, curated collections useful for systematic searching and targeted research. They often have document types and grey literature not easily found through other search engines or databases. EBSCOhost and Proquest are the two largest database platforms, hosting many databases (77 between them).

Introduction to Scopus and Web of Science

Scopus and Web of Science are the two largest interdisciplinary abstract and citation databases of peer-reviewed literature in the sciences. They both contain 10s of thousands of articles, book chapters, and conference proceedings.

Not everything contained in Scopus or Web of Science is full-text or comes from a scholarly publication.

Scopus and Web of Science overlap a great deal in the publications they cover but there are differences in their content. If you are not finding what you want in one of the databases, try your search with the other.

Scopus and Web of Science are very similar in the way they function and how they direct you in your search for articles. We will focus today on searching for articles in Web of Science, but the same method can be used when searching Scopus.

Searching for articles in Web of Science is fundamentally the same as searching in Scopus. Like Scopus, Web of Science allows you to limit your search results, retrieve full-text articles, and have access to "references" and "cited by" links.

Note: There is difference in some of the terminology used by the two databases. In Web of Science,
